NATIVE PLANT GUIDE 2020

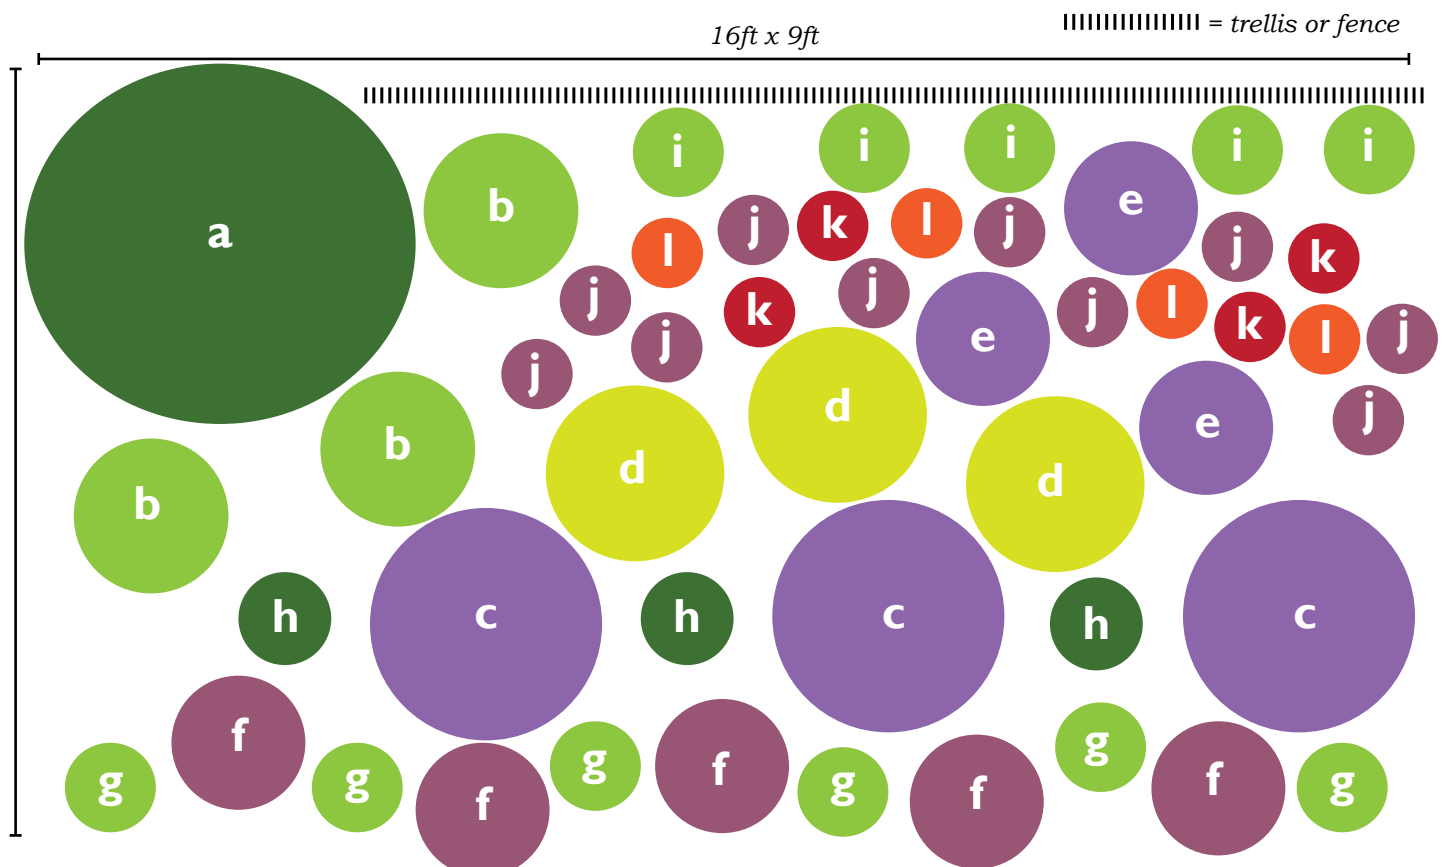

COMBINING NATIVES AND EDIBLES

By Katie Schmidt, Grounds Manager and Horticulturist

Growing your own produce is an easy way to cut down food's massive carbon footprint and get more fruits and vegetables in your diet. But many people don't have the yard space for a production garden and landscaping.

Perhaps it is time to bring kitchen gardens back into fashion — mixing food plants and aesthetically pleasing design. In Renaissance era France these were called potagers; in 1500s Scotland, kailyards. Diverse plantings of flowers, shrubs, herbs and vegetable crops ensured the kitchen garden supplied food and beauty throughout the growing season. Vegetables don't have to grow in rows!

I hope you will be inspired by the design below. This garden will attract pollinators, add color, and provide bushels of homegrown goodies for your summer dinner parties. The native plants seen here will be available at FloraKansas. Ask your local extension office for their recommendations on vegetable varieties.

- a. Cephalanthus, button bush 'Sugar Shack'
- b. hot or sweet peppers
- c. Aster oblongifolius, 'October Skies'
- d. Zizia aptera, golden alexander

- e. Tradescantia ohiensis, spiderwort
- f. purple cabbage or kale
- g. Sporobolus heterolepis, prairie dropseed
- h. oregano and/or thyme

- i. beans or peas
- j. Liatris spicata, blazing star
- k. beets
- l. carrots

PLANTING BY COLOR PALETTE

By Katie Schmidt, Horticulturist and Grounds Manager

Still in the middle of my home remodel, I am swimming in paint swatches and getting a surge of emails from paint companies about new color trends. It seems 2020 is all about natural, soothing tones that bring people back to nature. All the major paint companies are advertising palettes full of complementary hues to make the rooms of my home easy to design. But what about in the garden? With so many plants to choose from, it can be overwhelming to pick which natives you want in your landscape. Here are a few curated plant palettes to help you get started, with color and growth preferences already matched up for you.
